When he does that, he dictates which language is used, as whilst the air traffic controller may know English and, say, French, the pilot doesn't necessarily know French. It's a general rule between air traffic controllers that you always address in English, as you don't necessarily know the nationality of the pilot who you are talking to. English is compulsory for all pilots to know how to speak, which is the main reason it is the universal language to address pilots in.
